A Day in the Life at CMU Miami

Citron
Miaimim backwards is Mimiaim miami miami miami Global Tech Hub 2030

8 AM. My alarm beeps twice. I jolt awake, panic, and swing my arm at it. Miss. Shit.

"IT'S KENNETH C. GRIFFIN O'CLOCK!" it bellows, and tinny notes soon follow. Can't switch it off now – turning off the official Kenneth C. Griffin theme song is liable to suspension from the university.

8:15 AM. I brush my teeth in the dorm bathroom. There's no mirror; instead, a gigantic photograph of Kenneth C. Griffin watches me, grinning. I search for a message in his eyes. You've got some toothpaste on your lip, they say.

9 AM. Classes start. First up is 70-101 Making and Taking. I make a little bit, but it is all taken.

9:30 AM. The intercom makes a scratchy sound and we all stop in the middle of lecture. We stand, hands over our hearts, ready to follow along. "I pledge allegiance to the pockets of Ken Griffin, and to the stock holdings for which they provide…"

10 AM. It's time for societal problem solving. The teacher writes our topic on the board: HOMELESSNESS, underlines it twice, and leaves to go "to the bathroom." We spend class discussing homelessness amongst ourselves, but are unable to find the solution. D-.

11 AM. Money class. Today, we're covering Griffinomics, the modern reimagining of Reagan's trickle-down model. To be honest, I'm not sure which part exactly has been reimagined, but I nod along in the hopes that some of it trickles down to me. Registering for this class cost $399.99.

12 noon. Lunch time. My billionaire classmate thinks it's funny to bid a million dollars for every meal in the auction hall, and I can only put up $15.45. He makes me beg for a cheese sandwich, and then charges me $14.44 for it. Plus tax.

1 PM. It's beach time. My peers and I take a foray out to the beach. Not exactly sure what to do there. I get sand in my underwear and an awful tan.

5 PM. I start my homework. I don't even look at it, just plug it directly into the CMU-provided Kenneth C. Griffin chatbot. "The obvious solution is to increase rent," he purrs tenderly. I get rock hard immediately. I like to pretend he's giving me a handie while I copy and paste my homework; it is the only form of revenge I have left.

10 PM. The Kenforcers found out about the chatbot voice thing. They beat me half to death, leaving none of my body intact besides one leg, so that I can hop to class.

11 PM. Cocaine time. I'm not from the Miami area, but I read that this was the local custom, and I want to fit into the Miami culture. I do a line and pop a few melatonins.

Nursing homes begin to accept new senior patients

Daniel Yin
On death's door

With CMU in the top 15 of the US News National Universities Rankings, students are looking for ways to leverage their school's newfound reputation to prepare for the post-college life. "Before, I was worried I'd have to live out my final days in the eighth best nursing home in my city, but now I'm sure the fourth or even third might let me in," said Edith Soon, a junior with an undeclared major in Dietrich.

The Career and Professional Development Center (CPDC) has taken note of the excitement and is working to address student needs. CPDC Director Sean McGowan told Readme, "A larger number of students are beginning to look at more selective assisted living facilities and we intend to provide as much support as we can. After all, a good nursing home is an important first step for success in life."

CPDC now offers counseling on when to move into assisted living, how to get along with other seniors, and what to do if your children get divorced and you no longer qualify for financial assistance. "63% of the 2026 senior class is in off-campus assisted care," McGowan said. "So this is a top priority for us."

The advent of AI has also opened new opportunities for students. Brianna Trooper, a senior in policy management, is using LLMs to prepare for nursing home applications. "I've been using AI as much as possible on all my assignments. AI psychosis is something that retirement homes are looking for, so I'm trying to use my mental faculties as little as possible."

While most new graduates aim to get into a comfortable retirement home after a fulfilling career, it's not the only way. Some are instead hoping to get into the United States Senate in their 70s or 80s to ensure a lasting legacy, despite almost universally having worse afterlife outcomes.

Is the trend towards minimialism bad?

Point
Bartholomew Thistlewick

Minimalism has its place in artistic movements, there is no doubt that some of the most influential art works of modern times were inspired by minimalism; one need not look further than the works of Yves Klein to see this. But minimalism is not content being kept in the confinement of an art gallery. It has broken free and run rampant across architecture, flags, really every form of symbol.. Compare The Empire State Building to the AMA Plaza: where's the personality? The inspiration? In his pursuit of rationality, van der Rohe removed the "art" from architecture. We're left with nothing more than "chiecture". Apollodorus of Damascus would be rolling in his grave. This trend extends to logo designs, a seeming symbol of the increasingly distant, corporate feel of mass corporations. Iconic symbols morph into three lines and, if we're lucky, a circle Or even flags! Look at the flag redesigns. We see character, charm, every ounce of patriotism gone, in favor of three lines because the emblem was too complicated. Must we erase every trace of creativity! How long until every ID is colorless and bland? How long until every building is a beige rectangle? How long until every article in a satire newspaper must be written to fit the absolute minimum amount of text necessary to Learning Computer Science is not straightforward.

Kenneth C Griffin has run the tests and found the right school. But learning CS is a bigger hurdle than it looks. Most learning curves look something like this.

Rules are for fools

I saw Nasreddin walking from Doherty to Hammerschlag by way of Flagstaff Hill. "Nasreddin," I said, "That route's way too long. You should just go through Wean." "Exactly, everyone will be taking the shortcut."

One day, Nasreddin saw a sign on the Cut: KEEP OFF GRASS. He picked it up and placed it on the sidewalk. Satisfied that all was right with the world, he continued with his day.

———

Nasreddin submitted an assignment to his professor. "This is blank?" "I didn't know any of the answers." "You should at least try." "And risk introducing errors?"

———

Nasreddin stepped on Forbes without looking. A cyclist had to swerve around him, and yelled "Are you trying to get killed?" "No," Nasreddin replied, "If I were trying, I would have looked first."

———

It began raining as Nasreddin was crossing the Mall. Everyone sprinted for cover as he strolled casually. Someone shouted, "Aren't you getting soaked?" "Yes." "Then why don't you run?" "Would the rain become slower?"

———

Nasreddin was with his kids at the zoo, and one of the employees ran over, yelling, "STOP! You can't feed them that!" "Why not? They're perfectly nutritious." "I know. That's why we don't let visitors eat the penguins."

———

One day, Nasreddin's daughter fell sick. His wife handed him a thermometer and said, "Take her temperature orally." She left for a few minutes. Noticing the probe was still dry when she returned, "Why haven't you used it yet?" "I did it orally. She said she feels about 98."

———

Nasreddin entered the restaurant at 3:30. There was nobody at the desk, but a small brass sign read "PLEASE WAIT TO BE SEATED." Soon, a waiter came out. "We're closed." "I know." "Then why are you still here?" "I haven't been seated." The waiter considered this. "You'd better wait then." Nasreddin thanked him. The restaurant reopened at 6:00 and he took his seat.
